The Gospel of Thomas Revisited Once More

TODA Satoshi
No lengthy justification is necessary in order to discuss on the Gospel of Thomas. While it has been an object of intense scholarly debate for several decades, no agreement has been yet achieved among scholars on major issues, such as how to understand the relationship between it and the canonical (especially Synoptic) Gospels, or in which language Thomas was originally written (Greek vs. Aramaic or Syriac). Thus Thomas still deserves as much attention as it has received at the time of its first publications in the 1950s.

The year 2012 saw the publication of two monographs on Thomas, both of which were authored by scholars of British origin who belong to the younger generation of Thomas studies. The fact that the monographs were written by British (i.e., English-speaking) scholars is worthy of mention, because in the studies of Thomas there seems to be a curious divide between scholars in Europe and those in North America (especially in the U.S.): while in North America many scholars specialized in the studies of Thomas adopt the view according to which Thomas was compiled independently of the canonical (especially Synoptic) Gospels, in European studies of Thomas its independence vis-à-vis the canonical Gospels is not so much favored as in the U.S. In such a status quaestionis, it is understandable that British scholars, i.e. English-speaking scholars of European origin, could play an important role, and that the aforementioned two scholars themselves mean to play such a role. And the remarkable thing is that both of them plead for the dependence of Thomas vis-à-vis the canonical Gospels, i.e., against the view currently much favored in North America.

How are we to consider such a situation? Perhaps it would be better to stress here that, since I have come in touch with the problems surrounding Thomas while studying at the Catholic University of Louvain in Belgium (at Louvain-la-Neuve), I have a fairly peculiar background for the following discussion. Thus although I will try to present what the recent works of Gathercole and Goodacre have to say for the problems regarding Thomas, the presentation will often be interrupted by my personal reflections.

2 Gathercole seems to feel this necessity very keenly (see e.g. Gathercole, p. 15). It should be noted in passing that, as is pointed out by Gathercole himself (see ibid.), many American scholars of Thomas studies regrettably do not refer to, if not to say read, secondary literature written in Europe, including the U.K.
2. The Original Language of Thomas

Since Goodacre does not discuss the problem of the original language of Thomas as such, let us take a look at Gathercole’s monograph. Gathercole clearly pleads for the Greek original of Thomas, and in the Part I of his book (“The Original Language of Thomas”) he presents the arguments for his case as follows:

1. The Problem of the Original Language of Thomas (pp. 19–23),
2. Methodological Problems with Semitic Theories (pp. 24–42),
3. Proposed Semitisms in Thomas: a Critical Analysis (pp. 43–104), and

At the outset of the discussion, he enumerates Semitic (Aramaic or Syriac) and Greek as the possible candidates of the original language, and in this context mentions the discussion of Garitte which, according to Gathercole, favors a Coptic original of Thomas, and adds that the position of Garitte has not since been followed. This is a serious misrepresentation, however.

Gérard Garitte, who was professor of Catholic University of Louvain in Belgium, was one of the first scholars in the world that worked on the text of the Coptic Thomas. At his time it was already generally acknowledged that the Coptic Thomas contains the same texts as the three fragmentary

3 Gathercole, p. 22.
4 His first article on Thomas, “Les Paraboles du Royaume dans l’«Evangile de Thomas>”, co-authored by a Belgian New Testament scholar named Lucien Cerfau, was published in 1957 (Le Muséon 70, pp. 307–327), i.e., two years before the international edition of Thomas was published simultaneously in several languages from the publisher E.J. Brill (A. Guillaumont et al. (eds.), 1959). Four versions were published simultaneously, namely, (1) Coptic text + English translation, (2) Coptic + French, (3) Coptic + German, and (4) Coptic + Dutch.
papyri, published in the famous papyrological series The Oxyrhynchus Papyri at the turn of the nineteenth and twentieth century (P. Oxy. I 1, IV 654 and 655); thus Garitte minutely compared the Coptic and Greek texts. The result of this comparison was then published in 1960 in an article, in which Garitte argued that the extant Greek papyri attesting Thomas are translations from Coptic. Thus pace Gathercole, Garitte did not discuss the original language of Thomas in itself, but simply discussed the relationship between the two extant (fragmentary) texts of Thomas, i.e., Greek and Coptic.

To be sure, the idea that texts of Greek fragments are translations from Coptic is quite unfamiliar even to Coptic scholars. However, since I assume that Garitte is a great scholar as far as the problem of translation in the Christian Orient is concerned, his discussion demands a serious re-

7 The list of Garitte’s publications includes the following: G. Garitte, Documents pour l’étude du livre d’Agathange (Studi e Testi, 127), Città del Vaticano: Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, 1946, a monograph dealing with the literary tradition which starts from “The History of Agathangelus” originally written in Armenian and was then transmitted through various languages of the Christian Orient; G. Garitte, “La Vie géorgienne de examination.

Garitte’s discussion rests mainly on the two following arguments.

1. P. Oxy. IV 654 l. 10: οἱ ἐλκόντες ἡμᾶς

GTh log. 3: εὐχαριστοῦν πᾶς ἤστεικάς τοῖς πιστοῖς Ἰησοῦ πατρὸς ὁ θεός

According to Garitte, the underlined Coptic text, which means “Those who lead us”, makes sense, whereas the underlined Greek text, which means “Those who draw (or pull) us”, is unintelligible. Garitte argues that the Greek translator misunderstood the Coptic text, and his argument is quite possible, if not to say probable.

2. P. Oxy. I 11 l. 33–34: οὐδὲ ἰατρὸς ποιεῖ θεραπείας εἰς τοὺς γεινώσκοντας αὐτόν

GTh log. 31: οὐκ ἐοικεῖ θεράπησι οἴνος θεράπησι ποιοῦ

According to Garitte, a normal Greek would not say ποιεῖ θεραπείας, but simply θεράπησε; thus Garitte argues that the Greek expression ποιεῖ θεραπείας is a bad translation of the Coptic expression θεράπησε, which itself is a normal Coptic rendering of θεράπησε. And indeed, according to the search of Full TLG (Thesaurus Linguae Graecae, a famous project which consists in digitizing all known texts of ancient and Byzantine Greek) Corpus, instances of the expression ποιεῖ (in the active) with θεραπείας or θεραπείαν are fairly rare. I think Garitte’s judgement that the Greek expression ποιεῖ θεραπείας is not normal remains valid.

Thus although it might be surprising, I think we have to accept these arguments of Garitte, and to think that the Greek fragments preserved in the

Although one might think that 20 instances are not few, there are some 90 instances in which ποιέω in the middle is used together with θεραπείας or θεραπείαν. This latter expression (ποιέω in the middle together with θεραπείας or θεραπείαν) is related to the peculiar use of the middle voice of ποιέω (see LSJ A. II. 5), and as we see, the number of instances between the active and the middle is quite different. Thus Guillaumont, art. cit. (see n. 5 above), p. 329 is not correct when he argues, quoting the instance of Plato, Politicus 298e (θεραπείας ποιεῖ θεραπεύειν), that "que l’on ait le moyen ποιεῖθεραπεύειν au lieu de l’actif ποιεῖ θεραπεύειν importe peu". I think Garitte’s judgement that the Greek expression ποιεῖ θεραπείας is not normal remains valid.
papyri (at least, two of the three fragments) are translations from Coptic. And this has a serious consequence, since in pleading for the Greek original of Thomas, Gathercole naturally presupposes that, in the textual tradition of Thomas, the Greek fragments are prior to the Coptic text\(^9\). Since we follow Garitte, this presupposition cannot be accepted\(^10\).

A remark should be added here. Although I accept Garitte’s arguments, I do not think that the Coptic text of Thomas was not translated from Greek. It is probable that the Coptic text of Thomas is indeed a translation from Greek, because the beginning of log. 64 has the following passage:

\[ \text{ἄρα λέγει Ἰησοῦς: έντυφα ἤγετη τοῦ θανάτου.} \]

Although the word θανάτου of this passage is generally translated as “guests” or “visitors”, θανάτου originally means “foreigner”, and not “guest”\(^11\); so the correct translation of this passage should be “Jesus said: A man had foreigners”, which is of course awkward. Furthermore, the context shows that the guests who are invited in this logion are most probably not foreigners nor strangers. Thus it is probable that here the Coptic translator translated a \(^9\) His discussion on “Positive evidence for a Greek-language origin” (pp. 105–125) is based on this presupposition.

\(^10\) As mentioned above, Goodacre does not discuss the problem of the original language of Thomas at all; he of course presupposes the priority of the Greek fragments of Thomas to the Coptic text, and immediately goes on to discuss the relationship between Thomas and the canonical (especially Synoptic) Gospels, apparently on the supposition that Thomas was originally written in Greek.

\(^11\) According to the most thorough Coptic dictionary, i.e., W.E. Crum. A Coptic Dictionary, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1939, the meaning of θανάτου (565b–566b) is explained with the following Greek words: ξένος, ἄλλοτρος, ἄλλογενής, προσήλυτος, γειώρας. Except for ξένος, all these words express the notion of being foreign. As for ξένος as an adjective, its meaning is explained by the Greek word ἄτερος, which of course means “different”.

Greek word ξένος using the Coptic word ψήνο, and because of that the meaning of the Coptic passage sounds strange.\(^{12}\)

To return to the problem of the original language of Thomas, how are we to consider the problem, if we are deprived of using the Greek fragments for the discussion? Two things can be done. The one is to discuss on the theory of Semitic (Aramaic or Syriac) origin, and this is indeed done in a detailed manner by Gathercole\(^{13}\); interested readers could simply refer to his discussion.

The second thing we can do for the problem of the original language of Thomas is to simply compare passages taken from Thomas and the Gospel of Luke. Although both Gathercole and Goodacre make much more detailed comparisons, I propose this rough comparison, because, when one discusses that such and such passage of Matthew or Luke is a Matthean or Lucan redaction etc., that kind of discussion involves (if not to say presupposes) various hypotheses regarding the so-called Synoptic problem, such as Markan priority and Q-hypothesis, which are unacceptable to me.\(^{14}\) And I am certain that there is no communis opinio as to which passage of Matthew or Luke is a Matthean or Lucan redaction respectively. If that is the case, it is better to avoid having recourse to any of those hypotheses.

If one looks at the following passages taken from Thomas and Luke, \(^{12}\) However, it should be added that the Greek word ξένος is used in Syriac in a transcribed form, i.e., ψήνο. Thus one cannot exclude the possibility that the Coptic word ψήνο is a translation not of the Greek word ξένος but of Syriac word ψήνο, the latter of which is of course a transcription of the Greek word.

\(^{13}\) See the aforementioned sections 2. “Methodological problems with Semitic theories”, and 3. “Proposed Semitisms in Thomas: a critical analysis”.

\(^{14}\) My position regarding the Synoptic problem is presented in my article: TÔDA S. “The Reasons Why the Synoptic Problem should be Reconsidered Once Again”, Hitotsubashi Journal of Arts and Sciences 53 (2012), pp. 47–78. 1. GTh log. 16: οὐ γὰρ ἤμων ἐν οἷς ἤμων ἐξῆς οἷς ἤμων ἐξῆς ἤμων ἐξῆς ἤμων τεσσάρων ἐν ἑνὶ οἴκῳ διαιρεθήσονται πατὴρ ἐπὶ υἱῷ καὶ υἱὸς ἐπὶ πατρί
Lc 12: 52-53 (par Mt 10: 35): ἐσονται γὰρ ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν πέντε ἐν ἑνὶ ὅπως διαιρεθήσονται τρεῖς ἐπὶ δυσὶν καὶ δύο ἐπὶ τρισίν. 53 διαιρεθήσονται πατήρ ἐπὶ υἱῷ καὶ υἱὸς ἐπὶ πατρί one can say that only Thomas and Luke agree with each other regarding “five” and “three against two”.

2. GTh log. 31: ὁ προφήτης οὐ παρέμενε
Only Thomas and Luke have the expression “acceptable” (Coptic: οὐ, Greek: δεκτὸς).

3. GTh log. 39: Παισιαῖος ὁ πράγαμας σας ἡ κλεῖδα τῆς γνώσεως
Lc 11: 52 (par Mt 23: 13): Οὐαὶ υμῖν τοῖς νομικοῖς ὅτι ήρατε τὴν κλεῖδα τῆς γνώσεως
Only Thomas and Luke have the expression “key of knowledge” (Coptic: οὐαί, Greek: κλεῖδα τῆς γνώσεως).

4. GTh log. 47: πρὸς παῦσαι τὰς λαβεῖν τὰς πλατεῖας ἀλατικοῦ διώκει διὰ τοῦ ἱππήρ
This passage belongs to the famous pericope concerning “new wine into fresh wineskins”, but the expression of this passage is, beside Thomas, attested solely in Luke.
5. GTh log.79: οὐδὲ ἐγὼ σὺν ἡμῖν ἐπετίθηκος ἐστιν ταῖς εἰς τίνι τις προσέκειν ἡµέναν ἐποίησεν εἰς τούτον ἔρωτεν
Lc 23:29: ὅτι ἰδοὺ ἔρχονται ἡµέραι ἐν αἷς ἐροῦσιν· µακάριαι αἱ στεῖραι καὶ αἱ κούλιαι αἱ οὐκ ἐγέννησαν καὶ µαστοὶ οὓς οὐκ ἐθρεψαν.
The expression of this passage is, beside Thomas, attested solely in Luke.

6. GTh log.89: τετελειωθεὶς καὶ χειρὶ πενταχείμιον ἠπάτησεν ἡ γονὴ ἰτού ὁ πενταχείμιον ἦποια
Lc 11:40: ἄφρονες, οὐχ ὁ ποιήσας τὸ ἔξωθεν καὶ τὸ ἐσωθεν ἐποίησεν; The idea that he who made the inside made also the outside is, beside Thomas, attested solely in Luke (although the order is reverse).

These six comparisons clearly show that among the Synoptic Gospels Luke has special relationship with Thomas. It appears that somewhere Luke and Thomas had contact, which one can regard as a direct one. Where did such a direct contact happen?

Among the three Synoptic Gospels, Luke is the only Gospel that leaves no trace at all of relationship with a Semitic language. We know that there is a legend according to which the Gospel of Matthew was compiled in Hebrew, and we also know that the Gospel of Mark contains several passages in which Aramaic words or expressions are quoted. None of the things of this kind are known concerning Luke; one can say that the textual tradition of Luke revolved exclusively within the Greek-speaking milieu. And if it appears that somewhere Luke and Thomas had a direct contact, where did it happen? The place of contact should be somewhere within the Greek-speaking milieu.

and this means that contact was had in Greek. Thus it is probable that the original language of Thomas is Greek.

3. Dating Thomas, or the Relationship between Thomas and the Synoptic Gospels

Dating Thomas and discussing the relationship between Thomas and the Synoptic Gospels are considered almost the same thing; in fact, both Gathercole and Goodacre, for instance, try to show verbal agreements between Thomas and the Synoptic Gospels, and with these agreements in hand, they immediately argue that Thomas is later than the Synoptic Gospels, thus dating Thomas in a relative manner. It is clear that, in such a discussion on the relationship between Thomas and the Synoptic Gospels, Markan priority is presupposed\(^\text{17}\). However, this discussion contains a grave methodological error: Markan priority is a hypothesis which can work in the discussion on the relationship between the Synoptic Gospels, but for the relationship between the Synoptic Gospels and Thomas, Markan priority cannot be presupposed, simply because it is not demonstrated in that regard. Concerning the relationship between Thomas and the Synoptic Gospels, no discussion in which Markan priority is presupposed can be accepted. From this viewpoint, one has to say that Gathercole’s discussion in the part II “The Synoptic Gospels and Thomas” is an unhappy discussion.

Goodacre’s discussion should still retain us here, because beyond discussing the relative chronology of the Gospels (including Thomas) on the basis of Markan priority, Goodacre also proposes some concrete evidence for the dating of Thomas, based on the discussion made by the late German coptologist Hans-Martin Schenke. Schenke’s discussion is concerned with log. 68:

\text{περὶ τοῦ καιροῦ ἡ ἡγιασμένη θυτὶ πολεμίζετε ἡς ἡγιασμένη. Ἀλλα ἐπονομάζετε ἀληθῶς ἡ ἡγιασμένη ἡς ἡγιασμένη ἡς ἡγιασμένη.}

(Goodacre’s translation) Jesus says, “Blessed are you when they hate you and persecute you. But they (themselves) will find no place at the place where they have persecuted you.”

According to Schenke followed by Goodacre, since the word “they” means persecutors of Christians, i.e., Jews, the sentence “they will find no place at the place where they have persecuted to you” can only refer to Palestine, “or more especially, to Jerusalem”; thus it “points to the banishment of the Jews from Jerusalem after the year 135 C.E.”

It would be marvellous if one can find such a clear indication of time in Thomas, in which lack of narrative, or rather lack of any temporal framework, is so conspicuous. And in reality, the situation does not seem so clear-cut: in log. 68, it is possible to translate verbal forms of 3rd person plural (used four times: ἡ ἡγιασμένη, πολεμίζετε, ἐπονομάζετε, ἡ ἡγιασμένη) not in the active but in the passive (which is a perfectly normal practice when translating Coptic texts), and in that case the translation would be as follows (other slight modifications are also incorporated):

Jesus said, “Blessed are you when you are hated and persecuted. And no place will be found at the place where you were persecuted.”

Based on this translation, which I think should be definitely preferred to Goodacre’s, one would not be able to argue as Schenke did. It is safer to think that Thomas provides no clear evidence regarding terminus post quem.

Then how can we try to date Thomas, in a manner either absolute or relative, if we cannot have recourse to Markan priority, and if Thomas has no clear evidence regarding the time of its composition? In my view, if one can recognize any tendency in Thomas and this tendency can be situated in time, that will in some way serve as an argument for dating Thomas.

4. Tendency of Thomas

Here I come back again to my special background by quoting some articles of Jean-Marie Sevrin, another professor (now emeritus) of the Catholic University of Louvain. Although his articles on Thomas are largely neglected in the U.S. and in Europe, in my view they succeed in recognizing in Thomas a tendency which can be called in a sense Gnostic.

Sevrin’s argument is best understood when looking at the series of parables which are found in log. 63, 64 and 65 (Sevrin sums up these three as “parables against the riches”19). The following is his French translation of log. 6520.

(1) Il a dit: Un homme, un [usurier], avait une vigne, qu’il donna à des vignerons pour qu’ils la travaillent et qu’il en perçoive le fruit de leurs mains. (2) Il envoya son serviteur pour que les vignerons lui donnent le fruit de la vigne. (3) Ils saisirent son serviteur et le frappèrent, peu s’en fallut qu’ils ne le tuent. Le serviteur s’en alla et (le) dit à son maître. (4) Son maître dit: Peut-être ne les a-t-il pas connus. (5) Il envoya un autre serviteur; les vignerons frappèrent l’autre aussi. (6) Alors le maître envoya son fils. Il dit: Peut-être respecteront-ils mon fils? (7) Ces vignerons, lorsqu’ils connurent que c’est lui l’héritier de la vigne, s’emparèrent de lui et le tuèrent. (8) Celui qui a des oreilles, qu’il entende!

In this parable, Sevrin proposes to read the word “connaître” (Coptic: ΚΟΝΑΙΤΕ) as a key word which shows the judgement of the author of Thomas: he argues that, for the author of Thomas, those who “know” are on the positive side, and those who “do not know” are on the negative side. In light of this interpretation, it follows that the servant of the possessor of the vineyard, who “does not know”, is on the negative side, and that the vineyard workers (“vignerons”), who “knew” and killed the son of the possessor of the vineyard, are on the positive side! And Sevrin links this interpretation with an important textual modification: in the beginning of this logion 65 there is a word which reads on the manuscript ΦΥΡΗΠΙ Κ, and although this lacuna is often filled as ΦΥΡΗΠΙΣΟΚΙ “good, useful”, which does not make good sense, Sevrin proposes to read ΦΥΡΗΠΙΣΟΚΙς “usurer”, an interpretation which I think makes perfect sense. And if this interpretation of Sevrin is correct, then it would follow that the aforementioned tendency can also be called anti-capitalist.

Related to this anti-capitalist tendency is another key word “suffer” (Coptic: ΑΙΟΕ), which shows toil and trouble of those who work (e.g. the vineyard workers!)\(^2\). That those who “suffer” (French: peiner) are on the positive side is clear from log. 58, which I quote again in Sevrin’s translation \(^{21}\) See SEVRIN, “Un groupement”, pp. 435–436. Frequent use of this word in Thomas is also noted by GOODACRE, p. 182, but Goodacre fails to recognize the tendency recognized by Sevrin.

(italics mine):

Jésus a dit: Heureux l’homme qui a peiné, il a trouvé la vie.

And in light of this interpretation, the aforementioned possessor of the vineyard can be characterized as someone who does not “suffer”, i.e., does not take toil and trouble on himself. An investor who himself does not work is to be condemned. Likewise it appears that, according to the author of Thomas, the man who in log. 63 had much capital and conceived plans of investment is on the negative side. This reading or interpretation of Sevrin can also be extended to other logia, and as far as I can see, no logion contradicts this interpretation.

This anti-capitalist tendency of Thomas, identified by Sevrin and which he regards also as a Gnostic tendency, deserves much more attention. And if this interpretation can be accepted, then it would follow that, since Gnosticism is normally considered to have flourished in the second century, i.e., the period after the New Testament, a document which reveals such a tendency should be dated later than the New Testament. Such a discussion is admittedly vague as a discussion of dating, but since no firm evidence can be obtained for the moment, we should be content with a vague discussion like this.

5. Epilogue

Referring to the two recent studies on the Gospel of Thomas, we have seen how to deal with the important problems surrounding Thomas. At the end of this article, however, it should be stressed that the interest in Thomas was initially, and I should say soundly, linked with other documents which transmit Jesus’s sayings (so-called Agrapha), and that the excessive concentration of scholarly resources on the problems surrounding Thomas (especially the relationship between Thomas and the Synoptic Gospels) ironically and strangely contributed to lessening the aforementioned initial (and much broader) interest in Jesus’s sayings. Now is it not high time to go back to the quest of original problems? I am convinced that it is this quest that will allow us to properly situate Thomas, as well as the Gospel of Judas which was an object of journalistic sensation some years ago, in the context of the second century which was a most confused and thus most attractive century for the history of ancient Christianity.
